Competing risk analysis (CR) is a concept that has become increasingly relevant to many areas of research in the last few decades, but it is unlikely that many young students have much experience with it. In this study, the authors developed a novel high school-based assessment to explore the understanding of CR concepts and provide a foundation for designing a curriculum to teach CR. The authors created a survey of the assessment, which was administered to 4760 randomly selected students in one high school in the Boston area. A modest grade by grade level effect was found in the assessment of conceptual understanding. The median correct answers among 4th and 8th grade students were higher than the median correct answers among 10th and 12th grade students. The students were asked to construct a tree diagram demonstrating what information is provided about the degree of relationship between a particular disease and the probability of mortality. Many of the students did not understand the concepts of CR, and those that did were not able to construct a reasonable tree diagram. The authors present a novel assessment to evaluate the degree of conceptual understanding in the application of CR and present the data that were collected as part of the study. Many students showed limited understanding of the concepts and were unable to construct a reasonable tree diagram.
