Q: How to use a super-method as a callback method with JQuery's.ajax() method I have a function that returns a promise, which eventually calls a remote method on a remote service, and I want the data returned by that method to be used in the callback function of.ajax(). I've tried doing this by having the promise return the data, and then placing that data in an event argument of.ajax(), but.ajax() fails to use the data, and the function never gets called. The promise: return new Promise((resolve, reject) => { $http.get(url) .then((data) => { console.log("1"); resolve(data); }, (err) => { console.log("2"); reject(err); }); }); And the.ajax() call: let promises = []; for (let i = 0; i { promises.push(data); }); promises.push(p); $.when.apply($, promises).then(() => { // do something with the data //... }); A: In my experience, using new Promise doesn't help here. The Promise is not resolving. If you want to log the data you're providing, then you can use.then() to handle that: return $http.get(url) .then((data) => { console.log("1"); return data; }, (err) => { console.log("2"); reject(err); }); This assumes that you're trying to resolve the Promise when you're done, otherwise you won't be able to access the resolved value.
